Investor-state dispute settlement cases have significant public policy implications, including in the areas of health, environmental protection, economic development and taxation. This lunch series aims to examine the relationship between international investment law cases and sustainable development goals and policies. We invite international and national policy-makers, academics and students with different backgrounds to explore and discuss selected cases.

THURSDAY, 22 JUNE 2017:

TRADE, INVESTMENT LAW AND PUBLIC HEALTH: THE PHILIP MORRIS SAGA

Companies are increasingly relying on international trade and investment agreements as a tool to challenge domestic regulatory measures. The proceedings backed by Philip Morris and its affiliates are a telling story in this respect. The battlefield challenging states' regulations on tobacco products has expanded from domestic courts to international arbitral tribunals and to the WTO Dispute Settlement Body (DSB). What do these cases mean for the fight against tobacco consumption and public health measures? What can be learnt from these cases for the future drafting of trade and investment agreements? Join Benn McGrady and discussants to debate and discuss the Philip Morris cases before investor-state arbitral tribunals and the DSB.

SPEAKER: Dr. Benn McGrady is a Technical Officer (Legal) in the Prevention of Noncommunicable Diseases Department at the World Health Organization where he is responsible for providing technical assistance to WHO Member States and building their legal capacity to prevent noncommunicable diseases. Benn has advised public health bodies, governments, inter-governmental organizations and non-governmental organizations particularly on international trade and investment issues and trained government officials around the world.
